

#2 Became a bandwagon soccer fan

Just as I woke up in the middle of the night and looked at my smartphone, my daughter contacted me on Line saying that the Japanese team was playing a very good match against Germany, so I hurriedly switched on the TV. They scored one after another. Although I was not interested in the World Cup, the victory over the mighty Germans made me a soccer fan.

The "miraculous 1 mm of Mitoma," which triggered the comeback against Germany, cannot be discerned from the TV image alone, no matter how many times I saw it.

The same must have been true for the referees. I think that it was a goal that will go down in history as a result of technological developments.

In the first round of the final tournament, Japan lost to Croatia in a penalty shootout, but I think they played a very good match. The next day, there was a seminar starting at 10 am, but I managed to keep the sleepiness in check..

Although I have only seen the final between Argentina and France on the news, it seems that this was also a really good match.

I would like to go see an actual soccer match in the future.